Students found Price stimulating and witty, demonstrating thorough knowledge of the works studied. He encouraged discussion, something a few found slightly rambling, although he took pains to get to know his students. He examined the texts in the context of the Western Tradition, including the present day.

Ing's instruction was easy to understand, lively and detailed. However, she often ran out of time because she presented too much information within the allotted time. The slides were organized and informative, and contained appropriate examples, but they were numerous - it was hard to digest all of the ideas presented through them. Students still liked the course as Ing was friendly, helpful and caring.

MacDonald was enthusiastic, informative and responsive. Some students would appreciate more varied formats of presentation. While Stefanovic was an excellent lecturer, she barely taught any of the lectures. The guest lecturers she brought in were not as impressive as she was. Students would have liked to see more of her.

The course would benefit if the instructors posted slides before lectures. Many students felt the midterm did not integrate the three sections of the course well, and did not reflect the conceptual framework of the course. Some students felt the course was more like three forced into one. The readings should relate more closely to the course material.

This course had a total of 6 instructors throughout the year. Overall, they were interesting and knowledgeable, but the course lacked organization. There was no co-ordination between the different modules taught. In addition, students found the TA was unhelpful and had unclear marking schemes. Requirements for the course were not well-articulated. The breakdown of marks, which included a group project were found to be unfair. The course seemed to lose momentum in the second semester, and attendance dropped drastically. Content-wise, it was an interesting course, but logistically, it needed work. The multi-disciplinary approach was liked.
